S

S, ĕs. The nineteenth let. of the Eng. alph.—a sibilant articulation, com. classed with the semi-vowels, and found in all languages. Its proper sound is a hiss, made by driving the breath bet. the end of the tongue and the roof of the mouth, just above the upper teeth; the tongue being in nearly the same position as for t and d, but without contact of the organs. This sound it retains ch. at the beg. of words. In the middle and at the end of words it is very freq. vocalised or sounded as z; in many other cases, it assumes the sound of either sh or zh, wh. are distinct simple consonants; whilst it is placed bef. h merely to form the digraph empl. to repr. these last-named aspirations to the eye. In a few words, as in isle, viscount, &c., it is wholly silent. [Thus, contrary to the asser. of Walker and his followers, it may be safely stated that the 'sibilant s' is not more freq. in the Eng. lang., when cor. and eleg. spoken, nor indeed so freq., as it is in many other languages. Its predom. in Eng. is apparent, rather than real—ocular, not audible.] 35, 44.

Sub-, sŭb, pfx. Under, below; us. expr. a subordinate degree or imperf. state of some qual., cond., or rank, mentioned in the simple word, or den. he who or that wh. possesses it (in a var. of appl.: e. g.—); under, subord. (as in 'sub-committee', 'subcontract', 'subdean'); imperfectly, partially, somewhat (as in 'subacid', 'subsesquiburetted', 'subconical'); under, lying or being beneath (as in 'subaqueous', 'subcostal', 'subcuticular'), or den. that wh. is so (as in 'subdeposit'); after (as in 'succeed'); again, further (as in 'subdivide'); &c. For the sake of euphony, its b is often changed into c, f, g, m, or p, bef. those letters, or into s: as in succeed, suffer, suggest, summon, suppose, suspend, &c. Many words beg. with sub- and its var., are not, however, related to this pfx; whilst others have deviated from their orig. meaning, or have lost their char. as compounds. Somet. it stands for supra (as in 'sublime'). In L. phrases it exists as a sep. preposition (as in 'sub ro'sa' [-zā], under the rose; i. e., secretly, privately; 'sub silentio' [-se-lĕn'-she-o], in silence or secrecy). [L.] 69, 89. See Ad-, Con-, Dis-, In-, Re-, Un-, &c. [For 'formatives' in sub- and its var. not found below after their v., a., &c., and for the fig. pron. in full, refer to the prin. words.]

Un-, ŭn, pfx. A particle that gen. implies (1) simple 'negation' or 'denial' in a. and ad. (= a- or in- privative), —(2) 'privation' or 'absence' in s. (do.), and —(3) 'reversal', 'annulm.', or 'retrosection' in v. (= dis-, de-). It is added very gen., and almost at will, to a. and pp., and to p. (in -ing) so far as their meaning permits of the appl.; and from these new a., in many cases, arise corresp. ad. in -ly, and s. in -ness and -ĭty, with the us. signif. of the pfx (v. su.), although their number is neces. limited by the last consideration, whilst not a few of them (par. the a.), though good in sense, have grown quaint or.[a], owing to the existence of simpler or more euphonic comp. that expr. the same meanings. (4). In sev. comp. un- or in- is used indif. for this purp.; but the tendency of mod. usage is to prefer the use of in- in some words in wh. un- was form. employed. The latter properly occurs bef. words of Saxon origin—the former bef. w. of classical affinity; but the distinc. has not been strictly observed even by our best authors. It is also neces. to rememb. the great diff. of sense bet. 'a. formed directly by the add. of this pfx to pp.', and the 'pp. of v. already comp. with un-'; for in the former the pfx is equiv. to 'not', whilst in the latter it implies a 'reversal' or 'annulm.' of the action or state of the v., just as in the v. themselves. (5). Thus uncovered (from 'covered') and undone (from 'done') mean 'not covered' (i. e., naked), or 'not done'; whilst uncovered and undone, the pp. of 'to uncover' and 'to undo', mean 'made bare or left open by the removal of a cover or covering', 'annulled, effaced, or reversed after hav. been done', &c. Unlike in- and sev. other pfxs, un- is always negative, and suffers no euphonic changes. Its comp. are, in gen., self-expl., and req. insertion here eh. to shew their auth. and pron. When otherw., a sep. definition or an explan. parenthetical remark is added after each. The accents almost uniformly remain unchanged by the combination. In unanimous, unbecagon, unbarous, unison, and other like words, un- is a contr. or variation of the L. 'unus' (uni-), one. (Sax.) 69, 88. See Con-, De-, Dis-, En-, In-, Under-, Uni-, &c. [For 'formatives' omitted below, and for the fig. pron. in full, refer to the word qualif. by the pfx. For comp. not found under un-, seek under ig-, il-, im-, in-, ir-, &c.; some of equiv. sense also appear under dis-, and a few under de- and mis-.]

V

V, ve. The twenty-second letter of the Eng. alph. It is prod. in a similar way to f, but with a slightly feebler appulse of the organs; and differs from that let., ch. in the current of whispering breath being imm. preceded or accom. with the pec. sound or guttural murmur wh. disting. the 'flat' consonants. Formerly u and v were considered to be one let., and were used indiscrim. the one for the other; the only variation of sound being, bef. a vowel, to that of w. Subsequently the sound of v as allied to f, instead of to u, became fully est. in oral lang.; but it was not until the beg. of the 16th century that their peculiarities came to be marked in wr. and printing, since wh. time u has been used as a 'vowel', and v as a 'consonant', with their present sounds. The absurd prac., still continued in some dictionaries, of distrib. u and v under one let. or 'alph. heading', now that they den. completely distinct sounds, cannot but be obvious (a remark that also applies with equal force to i and j). 5, 64.

Y

Y, wī. A letter, the twenty-fifth of the Eng. alph., taken from the Gr. T, s. It is comm. said to be a 'consonant' at the beg. of words, and a 'vowel' when medial and final; but, as taught by Lowth, is in reality a 'true vowel' in all positions. When initial and fol. by another vowel, it has the sound of ĭ, or one imm. res. it; and in all other cases it has exactly the sound of ĭ, being either short or long, accor. to its position. The first of these sounds is that wh. was once given to j, and that wh. j still repr. in Danish, Dutch, Germ., It., Norweg., Polish, Swed., and a few other languages. The reason of 'a', instead of 'an', being used bef. y when initial, as well as bef. init. w and h, is given in the Introduction. As a pōr in cert. quaint or obs. words, it is explet.ive, and has the sound of e. 43-8.
